New Terms Abroad Programs
For Winter and Spring 2012

MOSHI, TANZANIA

About the Program:
• Students will explore the ways that culture and nature are connected by studying cultural ecology and economic development in Moshi, the heart of Tanzania's booming international tourism scene.
• Professor Liz Garland, who specializes in the anthropology of East and Southern Africa, and Professors George and Sharon Gmelch (both anthropologists) have collaborated in the development of this program. The Gmelches will lead the inaugural program.
• Important amenities like good medical care and internet access are readily available, but the region is also the cultural heartland of the Chagga people, and students will have many opportunities to learn about contemporary African ways of life.

Courses Offered:
• Intensive Swahili language course
• Culture, Environment, and Tourism
• Field Research Methods - An independent research project is required

Program Inclusions:
• The classes will include guest lectures by local researchers, officials, and activists.
• Study tours and excursions are an important part of the program. Several day trips will be taken from Moshi, each with a different theme or focus relating to cultural ecology, Tanzanian history and culture, and/or tourism.
• Program highlight: an eight-to-nine day field safari to the areas in and around Ngorongoro Crater Conservation Area and Serengeti National Park. This trip will afford students with some opportunities for game viewing, but the primary emphasis will be on exploring the challenges that living with wildlife (and tourists) poses for African people in the vicinity of these famous natural attractions.
