Current. Feeling Freedom with Feminist Film.

Belgian/French director Chantal Akerman's films are my touchstone for highlighting the power of discomfoting feelings in feminist film. Feminist film theorists and feminist directors have focused on increasing race and gender diversity, breaking harmful stereotypes, and creating a body of avant-garde alternative cinema. My book suggests instead that it is the solicitation of discomfoting feelings, depicted in characters onscreen and felt by viewing spectators, that could trigger desire for political change. Bodily sensations of suffocation, boredom, shame, cringe, and ambivalence are feminist film's most powerful tool for transforming women's relationships to each other and to political action. Such feelings force us to examine attachments—to raced and colonial hierarchies, fantasized ideas of motherhood and romance, individualized and autonomous notions of freedom—that must be left behind in order to embrace a relational freedom that values care, connection, and equality.
